There is increasing evidence that a complex microarchitecture with distinct microdomains in the plasma membrane of keratinocytes is required to maintain the skin barrier. Our previous results showed that the disruption of keratinocyte plasma membrane lipid rafts by cholesterol depletion led to a diminished expression of the cornified envelope and the cornified envelop proteins. We show here that the treatment of keratinocytes with the cytokine tumor necrosis factor-alpha (TNF alpha) caused their aggregation in the lipid rafts. An immunofluorescence confocal microscopy study demonstrated that TNF alpha alters the distribution of proteins involved in raft-mediated protein-protein interactions. In particular, it induces the formation of protein complexes consisting of the hemidesmosome protein plectin and the dystonin-binding receptor neuropilin, together with the dystonin microfilament protein plectin. No morphological changes of the cells were observed by transmission electron microscopy. The complex distribution of plectin and neuropilin in the cell membrane was also verified by a double immunofluorescence confocal microscopy approach. In conclusion, the experiments reported here demonstrate that the microarchitecture of the plasma membrane of viable normal human keratinocytes is profoundly changed upon the treatment with TNF alpha, and these changes may be of relevance to the mechanisms of tumor promotion in skin and in wound healing.A shooting at a Southern California high school injured one person, but the injured student survived and was expected to survive. An initial report said a single victim was struck by gunfire. However, the Sheriff's Department later updated the report to say there was a second victim who was treated at the scene and released. After they get the necessary shots, you are asked to find a home for them. So you could keep the dog inside the shelter, but keep in mind that shelter dogs are generally adopted more quickly than dogs from animal shelters that don't have a policy requiring that they be kept in. You might also consider fostering a rescue animal that's been in the shelter for a long time.
