She spoke at the State Department on Friday, a day after the United Nations Security Council took a vote on a report to determine whether Iran was abiding by a U.N. demand to refrain from further nuclear work. Clinton said the U.S. would try to keep dialogue with Iran and North Korea going. "There is no more important challenge than dealing with Iran. There is no more urgent challenge, and I still believe that when it comes to the nuclear issue, the best outcome of this debate is a diplomatic outcome," she said. Clinton said Iran continued to defy world demands to cease enrichment, saying sanctions must not be lifted unless Iran changed its behavior. The United States and other Western nations say Iran wants the nuclear material for an atomic weapon. Iran says it wants the materials for energy. Under the auspices of the U.N., a report on Monday by U.N. monitors found that Iran had continued to enrich its uranium, and said the country had failed to provide "credible assurances" that it would not use its nuclear material to build a weapon. Mottaki, one of Iran's most senior diplomats, has said that if the Security Council does not adopt the panel's findings and impose new sanctions on Iran, Iran would deploy missiles on the Mediterranean coast and close the Strait of Hormuz to attack oil tankers. Iran's Foreign Ministry called on the Security Council on Monday to consider whether sanctions are "within its competence" before imposing any new measures. The Security Council was going to debate a resolution drafted by the United States and Britain that calls for Iran to suspend all enrichment of uranium and remove its existing stockpile by November, replacing it with low-level uranium. Russia and China are concerned the resolution could trigger a new round of sanctions that could stifle the global economy. Clinton said that the U.N. should consider "all kinds of tools" to deal with Iran's nuclear program, including sanctions. "We have to be very realistic about what we can achieve in this next round of discussions

Detection of prostate-specific antigen in small cell carcinoma of the lung: an aid in diagnosis. We evaluated the clinical usefulness of serum and urine prostate-specific antigen (PSA) determinations in patients with small cell carcinoma of the lung (SCCL). We used a monoclonal assay for both serum and urine PSA determinations in 58 patients with SCCL (22 also had non-small cell carcinoma). Routine serum PSA determination was positive in 7 of 26 patients without metastasis and in 4 of 22 patients with metastatic disease (P = 0.41). In the 6 patients with bone metastasis (two with positive serum PSA) and one patient with pleural metastasis (also with a positive serum PSA) all serum PSA values were elevated. Serum PSA values were higher in patients with more extensive disease. Of 13 patients with positive urine PSA determinations 2 had bone metastases. Of 15 patients with bone metastases and negative urine PSA 8 of 9 had a normal serum PSA level. In patients with metast
