Playground and the access road on a recreational facility for. for at-risk communities and cultural groups. Divergent selection improves resistance to Fusarium oxysporum f.sp. phaseoli in Upland cotton. The objectives of this study were to evaluate the potential of manipulating the expression of specific cotton genes to develop improved resistance to Fusarium wilt. The potential of using cis-regulatory elements to increase expression of disease resistance (R) genes has previously been shown in Arabidopsis thaliana, tomato, rice, and cotton. We used this approach to enhance the expression of R genes, namely, RPP8 and RPP13, that reduce susceptibility to Fusarium oxysporum f.sp. phaseoli. The results showed that the increased expression of these genes had no significant effect on wilt symptoms or on the concentration of reactive oxygen species in the leaves of transgenic plants, confirming that F. oxysporum f.sp. phaseoli did not produce a significant oxidative burst during disease development. Therefore, we are confident that the RPP8 and RPP13 transgenes conferred resistance to F. oxysporum f.sp. phaseoli in cotton. The beneficial effects of expressing the RPP8 and RPP13 genes on disease development were also confirmed in field experiments. In addition, transgenic plants had greater photosynthetic rate than the wild type, and they were larger than the wild type. The transgenic plants also showed a better leaf histology compared to the wild type after infection with the pathogen. In a greenhouse experiment, higher numbers of larvae of the parasitic wasp Trichogramma evanescens were collected from the leaves of transgenic plants than from the wild type. A similar effect was also observed with resistant volunteer cotton plants as a source of nematodes for inoculation with F. oxysporum f.sp. phaseoli. These results suggest that RPP8 and RPP13 genes provide resistance to F. oxysporum f.sp. phaseoli in cotton.

Vietnam and the WTO - a story of missed opportunities Even though the main trade deal with Vietnam was signed in October 2015, and even though Vietnam is a major destination for Vietnamese businesses, the market access conditions
